Dissertation

Mass Media and the Domestic Politics of Globalization

- Abstract: This dissertation develops a theoretical framework for understanding how domestic media environments condition domestic responses to globalization. First, media ownership biases reportage of globalization and, consequently, how mass publics perceive globalization, leading to predictable variation in domestic policy responses to globalization. Second, media access conditions how effectively domestic groups are able to exact political compensation from national governments in response to globalization. Finally, domestic media freedom conditions the effects of international shaming efforts on domestic human rights abuses. These claims are substantiated with quantitative, qualitative, state- and individual-level data from around the world since the 1960s.
